

Presidential Libraries Faulted

■ Three of the seven presidential libraries have problems controlling valuable items in their collections, maintaining security and monitoring revenues from admission fees and gift-shop sales, according to an audit by the General Services Administration's inspector general.

The audit covered the Eisenhower Library, the Hoover Library and the Truman Library. The auditors said officials at the National Archives and Records Service, which runs the libraries, were not following specified procedures for security and accounting, primarily because of staff cuts.

In a written response, Archivist Robert M. Warner said he would take steps to improve procedures.
